Romano-British Brooches Whilst brooches are a common find on Roman sites they are still important as they can be dated. Due to the changing types of brooches through Roman history, this allows us to trace the spread of the Roman army and culture across Britain, after the invasion in 43 AD. Pre-Roman Colchester type brooches continued to be used.

A fibula (/ˈfɪbjʊlə/, plural fibulae /ˈfɪbjʊli/) is a brooch or pin for fastening garments, typically at the right shoulder. The fibula developed in a variety of shapes, but all were based on the safety-pin principle. Unlike most modern brooches, fibulae were not only decorative; they originally served a practical function: to fasten clothing, such as cloaks.
